In order to examine the magnitude and distribution of violence in Spain between 1983 and 1992, we conducted a follow-up of the National Health Survey from 1983 to 1992. The response rate was 66.9%. In comparison with men, women have higher rates of involvement in interpersonal violence in Spain, with intimate partner violence being the most common form of violence against women. Major changes were observed in the distribution of violence by type and means of injury in the last decade. In 1992 the majority of cases of violence were committed with low lethality weapons (10% being firearms). The absolute number of interpersonal violence cases dropped from 35.5 in 1983 to 27.4 in 1992 (adjusted for age and sex). Regardless of type, increasing victimization was closely related to decreasing age of the victim. The type of victimization was inversely related to the age of the perpetrator. The rate of homicide by firearm decreased from 3.0 in 1983 to 2.1 in 1992 (adjusted for age, sex, type of violence, and year of the survey). The role of firearms in homicides is controversial, but some data support the hypothesis that use of firearms reduces rather than increases interpersonal violence (homicide and non-homicide). The role of firearms as potential risk factors in the occurrence of non-lethal violence and suicide has not been fully established. It seems obvious that the increased use of firearms is directly related to the recent increase in violent crime. The decrease in homicide committed with firearms might be related to an overall decrease in violence.A prospective clinical study of T-cell chronic lymphocytic leukemia based on T-cell receptor gene rearrangements.
